THE CHRISTMAS TREE.

gellan leaves. He was told this was only a legend. On Christmas Eve, in Milan is the thirteenth century, called the Tree of the Virgin with four rivers represented as issuing from the base. Yggdrasil had but three. A superb tree of seven banyans was presented to Canterbury in the twelfth century; another to Winchester by King Canute in 1035. Anthony Beck, Bishop of Durham, bequeathed what seems to have been one of silver gilt, with an image of the Virgin and Child at the foot, to his cathedral. The Blessed Virgin takes the place of the Norse Hortha by the well or spring. A silver, branched candlestick remains at Lichfield, seventh century, in the gift of Leofric, Bishop of Worcester. The tree was placed at the entrance to the choir, and was certainly lighted at the midnight mass on Christmas Eve, as the Paschal Candle was lighted at Baster. —Cornhill Magazine.

QUEER STORY.

"I wish to goodness you'd be sensible," Flop<sup>o</sup> remonstrated her cousin, "and have a little less in the plate-room, at all events. I know it's all doing nothing but dream of your diamonds!"

Lady Langley laughed gaily, and seemed to take a malicious pleasure in keeping the conversation of the same subject, despite the cousin's very evident dislike of it, in which she was assisted by Captain Le Marchant, who chaffed Miss Clifford a good deal about her nerves, until the party separated for the night.

Next morning the house was in confusion for the diamonds were gone!

Lady Langley missed them the moment she rose, for, her maid being far from well at the time, she had hidden the girl not so far up her room, and had undressed herself, leaving her diamonds, which she had worn every day, on the dressing-table.

Miss Clifford found them when she came to bid her cousin's room to bid her good-night as usual, and she put them in their case. Of course, every hole and corner was searched, but in vain. The police came, but failed, but in vain. The police came, but failed, but in vain. The police came, but failed, but in vain.

Neither the thieves or the jewellery was ever recovered, and the case was dropped. The Duke and Duchess had lately arrived from London, and were positive that the robbery had been committed by some one in the house—a conviction that did not add to the comfort of the inmates of the Langley Towers. Suspicion ran riot; the household servants, one and all, belonged to well-known and respectable families in the neighbourhood, and had mostly been for years in the service of the Duke and Duchess; while the visitors' servants, as it happened, seemed equally above suspicion. Thus only persons who ventured to differ from the lady secretly, though not a trace of the baronet he had undergone escaped her; that gentleman openly. He was first to speak.

"It is a long since we met, Miss Clifford."

"But since we were together at Langley," she replied, softly.

"Yes, when the diamonds were stolen. wonder if that business will ever be cleared up?"

Just then dinner was announced; and the guests filed down in solemn procession. Although Colonel Le Marchant escorted Miss Clifford, her attention was at first claimed by her other neighbours. But when the conversation had become sufficiently animated to allow of private conversation, Colonel Le Marchant turned towards her, and, with a sigh, said,

"What a wretched time that was?"

said, softly.

"Found them? You don't say so?" he exclaimed, eagerly. "When? Do tell me, please," Miss Clifford. "You see, I only came home a few days ago, and have heard nothing."

"Oh it is nearly a year since, Sir James," said the fisher, with one of the stammering fits which he had been told to guard against. "His line got entangled in the branches of an old tree that had fallen into the river some time. In disentangling it they saw something wedged in against the trunk of the tree which, after a little trouble, they fished out. It proved to be the identical case in which the diamonds were hidden, and when it was first opened, the stones they were false enough, and reports were afterwards declared that the box must have lain there ever since the night of the robbery. The theory is that whoever stole it, must have hidden it in the river bank wearing a fetch when the fuss had blown away, and that the current swept it away to the tree stoned it."

"'Carious!' said Colonel Le Marchant slowly.

"'Yes, is it not?' he forced himself to answer quietly, for the strange answer to her companion's face troubled her, she could never know why. 'I suppose there is no doubt that it was some of the servants, though, after such a lapse of time, it would be hopeless to try and bring it home to one of them.'"

Le Marchant looked at her sharply, as he was just going to speak, when his wife interrupted him with some question about the Soudan, and the conversation became general till the ladies retired.

Miss Clifford had sheltered herself in the drawing-room behind a large portfolio of red leather prints to think undisturbed over her own private dealings with her old lover, when the subject of her thoughts quietly came up and took seat beside her.

"I cannot tell you how glad I am that these diamonds have been recovered," said.

"So am I," she answered. "Do you know, I feel, as if I were a clairvoyante, something of the sort, for ever since the robbery, whenever I have been at all unwell—"

"I suppose it is because you really like the water," said the boy, looking back at the "Water," was the startling answer.

"I hid the diamonds! What on earth do you mean? You must be mad, Colonel Marchant!"

"No, I am not. I saw you do it," replied quickly.

"I saw me do it? Then why do you come, and tell me any so at the time?"

"Because I saw read them, Cecil, and make a horrible mistake."

"You thought I stole the diamonds?"

He was silent.

"What was why you were so keen about this poor little lady's maid?"

He nodded.

"You believed—oh! I was and were trying to steal me all the time!"

"Forgive me, Cecil!"

"No, no, no, mean that you actually stole me the diamonds?" she asked in wonder.

"Fishes tell me!"

Colonel Le Marchant stopped over the book of prints Miss Clifford was ostentatiously examining, and answered in a low, hoarse voice: "I had sat up late in the smoking-room, worrying over some money trouble, and I was just about to go to bed when I was retreating as silently as I could to my quarters. As I was passing along the bedroom passage I suddenly saw you in your dressing-gown come out of Lady Langley's room carrying a tin box. Instinctively I drew back, and I saw you open the door of the window, and you walked by without noticing me. I followed you softly. You went to that little side door in the garden by the drawing-room about which young Lovat has chaffed Langley so much, unfashioned it, and carried out light across the back wards to the river. The door was open, and I went in. I bank till I felt certain you would step in, as I was just rushing up to catch you when you returned back—without the box! You scrambled as you came, by the little door (Miss Clifford said it was a trap-door), and I saw you enter your room. I was about taking a chair to speak to you, for the idea that they were asleep walking never struck me, but now. Next morning, when the robbery was

"But did you never go to look at the place?"

"Yes, that very day; but though I felt certain that I was on the exact spot, I could find nothing. This confirmed my suspicions that you had ascertained the spot, and I was obliged to know that you had not only yourself again visited the river. So you can imagine my feelings when I found you, as I thought, trying to fix the crime on Mrs. Compton's maid."

"Good heavens! what then was wrong with the place?"

"Why, there you were, and you so angry! Well, confusion for confusion! Colonel Le Marchant. You saw me, as you thought, steal the diamonds. For my part, judging from your agitation at the time, and your energy in denigating that poor girl, I was inclined to think you were a miserably true man; but your own confession sobriety that you should have done, and actually believed that your subsequent kindness to her was simply—reverse for having let her be suspected of what you had only just—well, and reason to know her it is not."

"What a chain of accidents!" said Colonel

Lo Marchant, slowly. "If only you but spoken out at the time I can hardly complain of your doubt; but yet I think you should have known me better."

"You doubted me, Denise!"

"But I saw you!"

Miss Clifford smiled.

She still sheltered by the portfolio which she were both apparently so interested in. Colonel Le Marchant caught his companion's hand, and uttered, whispered:—

"Let bygones be bygones, Cecil, and so no mistake against me, either. They have lost six years of happiness already!"

Though their time-etc. was interrupted by the entrance of the two ladies, he found means of uttering this appeal, for before the week was out, all the world and his wife were discussing the impending marriage of Colonel Le Marchant and the beautiful, unapproachable heiress.—Truth,
